

1. How did you first become interested in international literature?

- Wendy says: personal travel
Nadia says: Reading Russian literature as a kid. I couldn't understand a lot of it, but I knew I liked it.
- Bill says: Joining a school as a teacher of their sophomore World Literature curriculum. This increased a longstanding interest in the subject.
- tamera says: I have been reading international literature for nearly a decade. A friend of mine began introducing various authors to me, and I fell in love with parts of the world that I will not likely see in first person. This is the next best thing!
- Kristen says: As a reader and then as a teacher
- Barb says: I have been an English teacher for several years, but I've often felt as though I do not have enough knowledge about international literature. During the last few years, I have read some Asian literature, but I want to know more about international literature to help my students have a better background of literature.
- Christine says: I've lived in another country and I am an English Language Arts teacher; and I have always liked learning about our world through literature.
- Tracy says: Studying French as an undergrad in the late 80's early 90's
- Michelle says: I love reading about other cultures and countries!
- Anne says: I am a literary translator.
- Ari says: Childhood friends!

2. Which of the country units available on WWB Campus interests you the most?

